Dodo said, "Don't walk too far, dear."

"Make a puppet of her," Treff said.

Dodo thought, "No, don't do that, it's unlucky."

DODO, in the end, accepted Adelaide's offer of the Puppet Theatre but the objection voiced by Gerhardt was sound. He said that Adelaide would find it difficult to give up the habits of forty years. So it was, Adelaide, pointedly disclaiming all authority, was nevertheless constant with advice and annoyed when it was not taken.

Adelaide was still capable of a good long walk and on the first Sunday in August, 1944, she announced her intention of spending the afternoon in Kensington Gardens. As she walked stiffly out, Dodo said, "Don't walk too far, dear, it's awfully hot."

"I shall walk as far as I see fit," said Adelaide. Treff, Gerhardt and Dodo were sitting in front of the theatre on deck chairs and Gerhardt had a sketch-book on his knee. They had been conferring about changes in various sets and as Adelaide went by she pointedly did not look at it.

"You see?" said Gerhardt. "If it makes her really unhappy—" began Dodo. "Any change will make her unhappy," said Gerhardt. He rifled the leaves of his sketch-book impatiently. "Gilbert Lambert had genius, that I admit—at least when he made the original puppets for the theatre. But now we need new decoys, we have the material, and it is up to you to say whether I am to create them—though it will make Mrs. Lambert unhappy—or not."

Dodo sighed. In one way, her character strongly resembled her aunt's; they were neither of them artists, they were organizers. But deference to her aunt was a strong habit; the result was to put her in a quandary. "We'll see."

she temporized. "Finish them and we'll see." Treff, an ancient Panama hat tilted over his eyes, leaned back and observed that though Addie had ceased to pay the piper, she still called the tune. He added maliciously, "Gerhardt should make a puppet of her; then it would be our turn to pull the strings..."

Gerhardt took out a chalk and began to sketch. Out of the tail of her eye, Dodo saw a figure take shape: long, thin, very straight; all black save the profile and crown of white hair... She meant to say, "No, don't do that, it's unlucky," but the sun was making her sleepy.

Presently his hand slackened. There was a light snore. A vague premonition of bad luck again crossed Dodo's mind, and then sleep took her, too.
